Cardiac contusion is a common mechanism of sudden cardiac death, occurring in an estimated 5% of all traumatic deaths. Most cases of cardiac contusion are sporadic, but a variety of other etiologies can also manifest as sudden death following a blunt thoracic trauma. A review of the pertinent forensic literature since 1997 and a retrospective analysis of blunt fatal trauma deaths occurring in Halifax, Nova Scotia from 1 January 2000 to 31 August 2002. Six cases of cardiac contusion were found. The average age of victims was 40 years, and all but one were male. Four of the six cases involved professional drivers. The most common mechanism of death was a motor vehicle accident and one of the victims had been ejected from the vehicle. The haemorrhagic impact of the laceration of the aorta creates a false systemic appearance of shock because the flow of blood distal to the lesion is unimpeded. The diagnosis of cardiac contusion can be difficult because it is not reflected on autopsy. This diagnosis should be considered in patients who have sustained an apparent isolated blunt thoracic trauma in association with a sudden cardiac death.
