The complete sequence of the genome of the porcine immunodeficiency-virus-like agent (PIV-LA) provides answers to questions of a biological nature. In addition, detailed characterization of the major viral genes and of the genetic organization of the viral genome as a whole indicates how this new group of viruses has been evolved. A comparison of the complete nucleotide sequence of the two known porcine species-associated members of the rhabdoviridae, the vesicular exanthema of swine virus (VESV) and the rabies virus (RABV), to the sequence of PIV-LA revealed a strong conservation of the genome organization, with a few exceptions. The overall genomic organization of PIV-LA is similar to that of other members of the genus Rhabdovirus, being composed of five genes, coding for the glycoprotein (G), the nucleoprotein (N), the matrix protein (M), the transcriptional regulators phosphoprotein (P) and the polymerase (L) as observed for all the rhabdoviruses. The G protein has been shown by peptide microsequencing and the amino acid identity of the G protein of PIV-LA with those of RABV and VESV, to be closely related to that of RABV, the more distantly related ones being those of the PoRV-type. All the other PIV-LA proteins are most likely encoded in the order 5'-N-P-M-G-L-3' as observed for other members of the genus. The PIV-LA proteins were also compared to those of other members of the Rhabdoviridae family. The PIV-LA polymerase is most similar to the one of Bunyaviruses and PIV-LA appears to have similar properties than other members of the genus Phenuivirus (*Phenu aa67ecbc25
