Characteristics of the hexosamine biosynthetic pathway in the rumen bacterium, Prevotella ruminicola. The hexosamine biosynthetic pathway (HBP) of the rumen bacterium, Prevotella ruminicola, has been identified and characterized. This microorganism has been isolated from the rumen of goats fed a diet of alfalfa hay and raw corn silage. The biosynthetic pathway was elucidated using metabolic labeling and evidence was obtained that cytosolic and membrane-bound enzymes, the L-fucose-1-phosphate dehydrogenase (L-Fuc-1-PDH) and L-fucose-1-P, are responsible for the conversion of L-fucose to L-fucose-1-P. The breakdown of L-fucose, which may be the starting material for the HBP, was not observed. Addition of L-fucose-1-P to Escherichia coli cultures inhibited cell growth. Radiolabelled L-fucose-1-P was fed to the rumen bacterium and some of the label was incorporated into cellular components, with 80% of the label appearing in the hexose family. The HBP enzymes were identified as O-GlcNAcase and O-GlcNAc transferase. This is the first report of these enzymes in an anaerobic bacterial system. [Neurobiology of aging and cognitive impairment]. The term "cognitive impairment", generally referred to cases of dementia, is defined by the progressive deterioration of cognitive and intellectual functions. Aging, a natural phenomenon, is considered as one of the factors that contributes to cognitive impairment. Aging is often associated with damage of neurotransmitters. The hippocampus, a structure that is involved in cognitive function, has some neurochemical alterations which may be one of the reasons for cognitive impairment in elderly. Therefore, investigations about the role of neurotransmitters in aging-associated cognitive impairment will be beneficial for understanding the mechanisms of memory loss in the elderly./* * Generated by class-dump 3.3.4 (64 bit). * *
